Annex I to the letter dated 10 July 2007 from the Permanent Representative of Serbia to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General

Report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (S/2007/395): comments of the Republic of Serbia

The Report of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations for Kosovo covering the period from 19 February to 1 June 2007 appears to be made as a promotion exercise for the Mission's own position: it accentuates positive achievements and ignores the Mission's shortcomings and contentious issues that make the situation in the field unbearable for the Serbs and other non-Albanians. The Report, therefore, like the two previous ones, is dismissive of the isolation, economic discrimination and the fear of violence and maltreatment that, as part of low-intensity terror, are permanently resorted to by the majority Albanian population in an effort to drive the Serbs out of the Province and take over the Serbian territory.

The goal of establishing a multiethnic society in Kosovo and Metohija is far from being achieved and the proclaimed equality of ethnic communities is non-existent. The majority, Albanian, community enjoys full freedom, while non-Albanian communities are being increasingly ghettoized. A sad example, as well as a telling piece of evidence of the situation, is the number of Serbs in Priština which once stood at 40,000 and now stands at 87. This situation is misrepresented as evidence of the existence of differences and is used as an argument that a multiethnic society is being established in Kosovo and Metohija.

There are no returns. For seven years now, non-Albanians have not been coming back, despite a large number of IDPs (200,000) and internal IDPs (18,000). The main obstacles are:

1. Lack of personal safety and property security;
2. Lack of freedom of movement;
3. Lengthy administrative procedures which include obtaining agreement from local Albanian communities, balance programmes etc.;
4. Lack of financial resources and years-long wait for funds for return projects already approved;
5. Ethnic employment discrimination in communities in which jobs are available and lack of security in tending fields and/or harvesting forests;
6. Unavailability of public service jobs;
7. Failure to decentralize government;
8. Lack of trust in the Provisional Institutions of Self-Government (PISGs); and
9. Ineffective UNMIK administration.

If indeed progress has been achieved in the freedom of movement and respect for human rights, why are walls being built around churches and monasteries and sites of Serbian cultural heritage? Besides, the sites are being given a new and erroneous name “Kosovo cultural heritage” in which way they are being denied Serbian origin and appurtenance to the Serbian people.

It is stated in the Report that the non-Albanian population does not participate in PISGs. Perhaps it only goes to prove that, after all, non-Albanians were in fact assigned a decorative role in the once benevolent effort to find a just solution for the question of Kosovo and Metohija.

It is contended in the Report that “lack of [...] access to international loans” continues to hamper the Kosovo and Metohija economy. This contention is inaccurate since international financial institutions are present in Kosovo and Metohija. Besides, the offer of Serbia to open a separate account in the Central Bank of Serbia to facilitate the transactions between the international financial institutions and the Provincial Government, although never accepted, is still on the table.

The Report goes on to say that progress has been achieved in privatization. No mention is made, however, that the forcible privatization has damaged the interests of the State of Serbia, Serbian companies and the citizens of Serbia other than ethnic Albanians and that indeed their property rights have been annulled by the privatization. As many as 20,000 private property complaints have been filed, while numerous forged documents alleging claims to the property of Serbs and other non-Albanians circulate in Kosovo and Metohija. It is also stated in the Report that various laws have been drafted or adopted. It may be so, but the laws are enacted by the will of one ethnic group alone motivated by the drive to secede from the State of Serbia.

The Report does say that UNSC resolution 1244 has not been implemented in its basic parts. It does not say, however, that the UNMIK-FRY Common Document of November 2001 is not being implemented and that the work of working groups on kidnapped and missing persons, on returns, energy, transport and telecommunications has been perfunctory and brought no results. Some results, though, have been achieved by the technical subgroup for returns, but they have not been implemented and are not mentioned in the Report.

Because of its bias and partiality, the Report makes no contribution to the establishment of a multiethnic society, respect for human rights, implementation of United Nations documents and decisions or to reconciliation and normalization of the situation in Kosovo and Metohija. It also does not help create a proper atmosphere for the resumption of negotiations and a genuine quest for a joint and just solution to the status of Kosovo and Metohija which is possible to attain only through direct dialogue between Belgrade and Priština.

Contrary to the routine, selective and bureaucratic Report, we have had genuine accounts of the situation in the field by many eminent officials who have served in high positions in the Province. One account was recently presented by General Fabio Minni of Italy and was followed by longest-serving British Labour Minister Michael Meacher (1997-2003) and Australian diplomat, politician and university professor Gregory Clark. In its issue of 2 July 2007, The Japan Times carried Professor Clark’s article Serbia Owed Justice in Kosovo in which he criticized the current policy of international institutions in Kosovo and Metohija in a very documented way.

Many sources reveal that the situation in Kosovo and Metohija, in particular the situation within the Albanian ethnic community, is plagued by a profound structural crisis. The situation is characterized by an economy dependent on international donations and workers' remittances from abroad, a 60 per cent unemployment rate, endemic disrespect for law, social repression and militarization, a culture of fear, intolerance, aggression, inter-ethnic hatred, ghettoization of minority groups and systematic violence against them and a pervading lack of perspective among the young generation, in particular.

The situation calls for a complex approach. Only by addressing the crisis in a balanced and pro-active way can an effective, long-term and sustainable solution be achieved. However, the activities that purport to aim at finding a just solution for the Kosovo and Metohija crisis tend to unfurl under the banner of the simplistic fundamentalist programme of Independent Kosovo or War. Oftentimes, the staunchest advocates of this irresponsible and morally untenable programme of blackmail are local, as well as regional and global actors and stakeholders.
