The agenda was adopted.

Peace consolidation in West Africa

Report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Office for West Africa (S/2010/324)

The President: In accordance with the understanding reached in the Council's prior consultations, I shall take it that the Security Council agrees to extend an invitation under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to Mr. Said Djinnit, Special Representative of the Secretary-General and head of the United Nations Office for West Africa.

It is so decided.

I invite Mr. Djinnit to take a seat at the Council table.

The Security Council will now begin its consideration of the item on its agenda. The Council is meeting in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations.

I wish to draw the attention of members to document S/2010/324, which contains the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Office for West Africa.

At this meeting, the Security Council will hear a briefing by Mr. Said Djinnit, to whom I now give the floor.

Mr. Djinnit: It is a distinct honour and privilege to introduce to the Security Council the report of the Secretary-General (S/2010/324) on the activities of the United Nations Office for West Africa (UNOWA), and to brief the Council on the overall peace and stability situation in the subregion during the past six months. I am particularly pleased that this meeting is being held under the auspices of Nigeria, the country currently assuming the chairmanship of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS).

When I briefed the Council six months ago (see S/PV.6256), West Africa presented a mixed picture of positive developments and less encouraging trends, thus raising legitimate concern about the prospects for consolidating peace and stability in the region. Indeed, a presidential election was pending in Togo in an atmosphere of deep anxiety and widespread tension. A constitutional crisis was evolving in Niger with little prospect for a consensual solution. The situation in Guinea was deteriorating, while existing and emerging challenges such as food insecurity, drug trafficking and criminal activities, including terrorist acts, were affecting the lives of large segments of the population in the subregion.

Since then, West Africa has made significant progress in crisis prevention and peacebuilding amidst daunting difficulties and persistent challenges. Over the past six months, the global economic recovery has supported economic growth in West Africa. However, this growth has yet to be translated into effective and sustainable poverty reduction programmes, while prospects for achieving the Millennium Development Goals remain weak. In addition, the ongoing food crisis is affecting millions of people in the Sahel, particularly in Niger, where over 7 million people — an estimated 60 per cent of the country's population — face the threat of famine and are in the midst of a serious food, nutrition and pastoral crisis.

On the political front, the holding of peaceful elections in Togo and the subsequent formation of a new Government with the participation of part of the opposition, as well as the continued commitment of the authorities of Niger to the transition programme scheduled to end in March 2011, are encouraging signs of progress.

During the reporting period, great emphasis was also placed on addressing the crisis in Guinea, where the process towards constitutional order has been moving forward. Despite the numerous hurdles encountered, the first round of presidential elections was organized peacefully on 27 June. I am proud of the collaborative efforts by different United Nations entities in supporting the Guinean transition process, including through the financial support of the Peacebuilding Support Office and by initiating security sector reform (SSR). Now that the country is preparing for the second round of the presidential election, the United Nations should continue to provide the much-needed support for completing the electoral process in a smooth and peaceful manner, and more importantly, develop a framework for sustaining democratic governance and promoting development beyond elections.

Needless to say, stable and peaceful democratic governance in Guinea will have far-reaching implications for regional stability, especially in consolidating hard-won peace in Sierra Leone and Liberia and in enhancing efforts to address the ongoing crisis in Guinea-Bissau. I wish to seize this opportunity to commend the International Contact Group on Guinea for its valuable contribution to the transition process, particularly the critical role played within that Group by members of the Council.

The Office has also focused on key cross-cutting and cross-border issues that are affecting peace and stability in the subregion. In this regard, UNOWA established a regional network of practitioners to assist West African countries in the area of security sector reform. This network has so far made a contribution to the development by ECOWAS of its regional SSR framework and to the preparation of the SSR assessment process in Guinea. These are only initial steps which need to be reinforced in order to respond to the growing needs of the subregion in this field. That is all the more important in view of the linkages among SSR, democratic governance and the fight against drug trafficking, another priority area in which the Office has been working closely with ECOWAS and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime.

The recent seizure of two tons of cocaine in the Gambia, with the assistance of the United Kingdom, and the arrest of suspects in the United States who were planning to smuggle four tons of cocaine to Europe and North America through Liberia are evidence of the increasing commitment of the West African States to fighting the scourge of drug trafficking and of the vital importance of international cooperation. These developments are indeed very encouraging, bearing in mind the continuing evolution of drug trafficking methods and the possible connections with other organized criminal activities, including acts of terrorism, especially in the Sahel band and beyond.

The Office pursued its efforts to promote the role of women in consolidating peace and stability in the subregion, in line with resolution 1325 (2000) and all subsequent resolutions. In particular, UNOWA engaged women's associations and leaders in Guinea in support of the transition process, including the conduct of peaceful elections.

Allow me to conclude by making four observations. First, the recent progress made in consolidating peace and stability in West Africa highlights the role that UNOWA plays as an effective regional tool of the United Nations for conflict prevention and peacebuilding.

Secondly, this progress has been achieved, first and foremost, thanks to the commitment and sacrifice of the people of the region and its leaders. It has also been effectively supported through the excellent collaboration that UNOWA has forged with ECOWAS, as the leading regional institution, and the African Union, which in the case of Guinea has contributed to galvanizing the international community into concerted action to help move the transition process forward.

Thirdly, recent experience in the subregion has shown that opportunities for crisis prevention and sustainable peace are available now more than ever before. Indeed, international assistance and capacity-building programmes, such as support to SSR, electoral assistance, the promotion of human rights and cooperation in the fight against drug trafficking and organized crime could provide, in my view, useful entry points for conflict prevention.

Fourthly, despite significant progress in peace consolidation, West Africa remains at a crossroads, owing to the persistence of the root causes of conflicts in the region, such as social disparities, ethnic tensions and governance challenges, which risk undermining the progress achieved. This requires the continued support of the international community, including the United Nations, to maintain the momentum for peace and stability in the subregion.

Finally, I wish to thank the members of the Council for their continued commitment to peace and security in West Africa and their tireless efforts towards addressing the challenges the subregion faces.

The President: I thank Mr. Djinnit for his briefing.

In accordance with the understanding reached in the Council's prior consultations, I now invite Council members to informal consultations to continue our discussion on the subject.
