GUINEA

Recent Council Action
On 16 February the Council adopted a presidential statement on the situation in Guinea, in which it:

- Welcomed “the recent positive developments in Guinea while remaining concerned by the situation”.
- Welcomed the 15 January Joint Declaration of Ouagadougou, which provided for the establishment of a national unity government led by a civilian prime minister designated by the opposition, and the holding of elections within six months.
- Welcomed the appointment on 21 January of Jean-Marie Doré as Prime Minister, and the designation of a unity government on 15 February, and called on all stakeholders to implement the Joint Declaration in full and to engage actively in the transition towards the restoration of the normal constitutional order through the holding of elections within six months.
- Recalled its strong condemnation of the violence committed on 28 September 2009 and its aftermath. The Council urged the national authorities to prevent any further violence and to uphold the rule of law.
- Emphasised the responsibility of states to comply with their obligations to end impunity.
- Noted the invitation by the International Contact Group on Guinea to relevant international stakeholders, including the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), the AU and the mediator, to consider deploying a possible joint civil-military mission in Guinea with a view to discussing processes for defence and security sector reform, and contributing to secure conditions for the electoral process.

Relevant Background Developments
On 12 January the Guinean junta leader, Captain Moussa Dadis Camara, arrived in Ouagadougou, the capital of Burkina Faso, from a hospital in Rabat, Morocco, where he had been convalescing since a failed assassination attempt on his life on 3 December 2009. Camara’s return to the West African subregion led to heightened tensions due to a reported split in the junta with one faction agitating for his return to Conakry and the other, led by interim leader Brigadier General Sekouba Konate, preferring a transition back to civilian rule.

Following talks between Camara, Konate and leading junta members on 15 January in the Ouagadougou, the capital of Burkina Faso, an agreement to transfer power to civilian rule—the Joint Declaration of Ouagadougou—was reached between Camara and Konate through the mediation of President Blaise Compaoré of Burkina Faso. The Declaration provided for the establishment of a national unity government led by a civilian prime minister designated by the opposition and the holding of elections within six months. The accord also committed the transitional head of state, members of the junta—the National Council for Democracy and Development (or CNDD, using its French acronym), the Prime Minister, members of the unity government and the active defence and security forces not to stand in the upcoming presidential election.

On 18 January Camara broke his silence in a televised address from Ouagadougou—his first public statement since being shot in December—in which he endorsed the Joint Declaration of Ouagadougou.

On 21 January leading opposition figure Jean-Marie Doré was appointed as Prime Minister of Guinea. (Doré, an intellectual and a lawyer educated in France, who has led the Union for the Progress of Guinea party, has been an outspoken critic of military rule and was an organiser of the 28 September 2009 demonstration.)

On 26 January the International Contact Group on Guinea (consisting of the UN, the World Bank, the AU, ECOWAS and other key regional organisations and key partner countries—e.g. Burkina Faso, France, Morocco, the UK and the US), issued a communiqué on the situation in Guinea, which welcomed the positive developments in the country and invited “ECOWAS, the AU, the UN and the Mediator to deploy as soon as possible, and in consultation with the Guinean authorities, a joint civil - military mission with a view to discussing the modalities for the implementation of these reforms and also contributing to the creation of the requisite security conditions for the electoral process.”

On 2 February the Guinean national commission of inquiry into the events of 28 September issued its findings in which it singled out Lieutenant Aboubacar Chérif Diakité (the former aide-de-camp of Camara who attempted to kill the latter in December 2009) as being solely responsible for the killing of the pro-democracy activists. It said that all suspects should be tried before Guinean Courts. (The UN Commission of Inquiry into the event had recommended that they should be tried before the International Criminal Court (ICC). For details, please see our 11 January Update Report.) The commission also recommended a general amnesty for opposition leaders who were said to have contravened the law when they held the pro-democracy demonstration on 28 September.

On 5 February Diakité, who remained in hiding, said in an interview with Radio France that he was prepared to face an international commission or court in relation to the accusations of his being responsible for the September 2009 military violence. He also requested a pardon from Prime Minister Doré.

On 15 February a national unity government was designated by interim president, Konaté, and Prime Minister Doré. On 16 February the transitional unity government was expanded with the addition of two junta members, Captain Claude Pivi and Lieutenant Colonel Moussa Tiegboro Camara. Both men had been reported by the media to have been implicated in the 28 September 2009 military violence against pro-democracy demonstrators in Conakry.

From 17 to 19 February the deputy prosecutor of the ICC, Fatou Bensouda, carried out a preliminary investigation into the 28 September 2009 events in Conakry. At the conclusion of her visit she stated that the killings of opposition supporters on 28 September and their aftermath constituted a crime against humanity, and that the ICC could continue with its preliminary investigation.
On 19 February Prime Minister Doré told the press that Guinea’s judiciary was incapable of trying the suspects in the military violence against pro-democracy activists on 28 September 2009. (While it is noteworthy that Doré chose to talk to the press and not the deputy prosecutor about the inability of the Guinean courts to handle the matter—contrary to the recommendations of the Guinean national commission of inquiry—this admission could mean that the possibility of the ICC being requested by the government to take up the matter at a later date cannot be ruled out. The ICC remains at the preliminary stages of its analysis of the issue.)

Key Issues
The key issue for Council members has been the fragile security situation in Guinea and its potential to destabilise peace and security, especially in the Manú River region.

A closely related second key issue has been agreeing on the most appropriate Council action including possible political support for UN and AU efforts and how far to go in endorsing the findings of the International Commission of Inquiry (COI) which investigated the 28 September events and their aftermath.

Another closely related issue has been maintaining consistency with its own presidential statements of 5 May and 28 October 2009 expressing concern about the resurgence of unconstitutional changes of government in some African countries and the situation in Guinea, respectively.

Council Dynamics
The adoption of a presidential statement on Guinea followed an earlier decision during private consultations between Council members on 12 January to delay action on a draft presidential statement proposed by France in January. African members (i.e. Nigeria, Uganda and Gabon) together with Russia and China argued for delay to take into account the views of the AU summit scheduled from 25 January to 2 February, on the issue into the Council’s consideration. (For background details, please see our 11 January Update Report).

Subsequently, Russia and China, as well as the US and African members, preferred that no references should be made to the ICC. Russia and China were also uncomfortable with strong references to the issue of impunity favoured by other members like France, UK, the US, and Brazil. Nigeria and Uganda were also interested in a statement that would acknowledge the improvements in the situation on the ground.

A compromise was made necessary when it became clear that the Council had to act quickly for any statement to have relevance to the immediate situation. This resulted in the presidential statement whose balanced opening sentence gave an indication of the compromises negotiated in the text: “The Security Council welcomes the recent positive developments in Guinea while remaining concerned by the situation”. There was no reference to the ICC in the text, with the implicit understanding that Guinea is a party to the Court’s Rome statute so the ICC did not require the Council’s endorsement to act. However, reference was made to the need to end impunity. The Council apparently opted to “commend” and “note positively” (i.e. rather than “welcome”) the work and report of the COI as a concession to Russia which has had reservations about the nature of the interface between the Commission and the Council. (For details, please see our 11 January Update Report)
Looking Ahead
Options for the Council on this issue in the near future include:

- closely monitoring the situation for possible Council action, as appropriate; and
- considering a visit to Guinea (and other politically fragile states in the region on the Council’s agenda: e.g. Cote d’Ivoire, Guinea-Bissau, etc.) by a Council mission (possibly a small one) to demonstrate the Council’s resolve to prevent a return to conflict which has proved contagious in the region in the past.
