Annex*Statement by the Permanent Representative of the Philippines to the United Nations on the report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict in the Philippines, made at the 65th meeting of the Working Group on Children and Armed Conflict

Mr. Chair,

Thank you for this opportunity to address this Working Group to discuss the report of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict in the Philippines, for the period from December 2012 to December 2016.

I wish to thank the honourable Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict, Ms. Virginia Gamba, whom I had the pleasure of meeting earlier this week.

I wish to further thank the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict for the transparent and collegial manner in which the report was prepared, which gave the Philippine Government the opportunity to comment on the draft. We appreciate the effort to achieve a fair and balanced reporting process.

Mr. Chair,

We share, to an even greater degree if that was possible, the profound concern of the United Nations for the safety of children in armed conflict. There is absolutely no excuse, no justification, no conceivable rationale for enlisting, let alone hurting, children in armed conflicts as armed groups tend to do. Children's very evident size and vulnerability make it impossible to believe that they are hurt inadvertently in a fight, or that they can be used deliberately to fight. Armed groups that have so used them are beneath contempt. That they have, of late, moderated their use and abuse of children merely underscores that the deplorable practice has finally touched, if not their conscience, then their self-interest to appear better in the eyes of the world.

The Philippines has suffered human, social and economic costs from decades-long armed conflicts waged by different armed groups. Finding a resolution to these conflicts and attaining peace remain at the core of my country's national security and development agenda. President Rodrigo Roa Duterte has advanced a Six-Point Peace and Development Agenda, which aims to bring about, one, new peace agreements consistent with human rights and our democratic constitution, along with the meaningful implementation of existing agreements and commitments with the various armed groups; two, a peace that promotes catch-up socioeconomic development in conflict areas; and, three, a culture of peace and conflict sensitivity. Once realized, this Agenda will positively impact the lives of children in armed conflicts.

Mr. Chair,

The Philippines is a State party to the Convention on the Rights of the Child. As such, it is committed to undertake the appropriate measures to enforce the rights recognized in the Convention and accompanying Optional Protocols for the protection of children from recruitment and use in armed conflict and from all forms of sexual abuse and exploitation, including rape by soldiers whose sworn duty is to protect them. That the incident in question is isolated does not diminish its repulsiveness. Armies are raised to win conflicts without inflicting abuses that create new ones. Towards this end, the Second National Action Plan for Children was crafted to sustain existing and to identify new programmes and activities for the protection of children.

Since the last reporting period, the Philippines has gone further in institutionalizing mechanisms to prevent violations against children in armed conflicts.

One, there is the monitoring, response and reporting system for grave child rights violations, under the auspices of the Philippine Council for the Welfare of Children.

Two, there is the Inter-Agency Committee on Children in Armed Conflict, which coordinates with the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) and its technical working group on the United Nations country task force on monitoring and reporting grave child rights violations in armed conflicts. The Committee reviews cases of alleged violations. These mechanisms are up and running as we speak, particularly in the ongoing resolution of the crisis in Marawi.

Three, the Philippine Government continues to strengthen its capacity to address and prevent the incidence of grave violations by training and empowering front-line service providers at the local government and community levels, with the participation of civil society in identifying, reporting and responding to incidents.

Four, the Armed Forces of the Philippines have started implementing a strategic plan drafted with UNICEF to better protect children in the course of military operations. The Armed Forces have since reached some of the benchmarks. Policy and mechanisms to respond better to child victims are being improved.

Mr. Chair,

In my meeting with Ms. Gamba earlier this week, she expressed her desire to maintain a continuous engagement between her Office and Member States on issues affecting children in armed conflicts. I welcome this initiative because it addresses two concerns that, in my experience, pose a challenge to achieving fair and balanced reporting on the part of the Special Representative, namely: the brevity of the time within which a Member State must provide comments on a draft report; although I am aware that the more time, the more excuses can be invented. And second, the lack of clarity and details of some cases cited in reports, which makes it difficult for the Governments concerned to validate them.

We have no need or desire to hide abuses. We want an army that fights to win conflicts, not to create new conflicts through abuses, especially of children. It is my hope that establishing and nurturing a relationship with the Office of the Special Representative will facilitate the issuance of timely, accurate and balanced reports and pave the way to stamping out violence against children in the wars that Member States still sadly wage to protect their people from enemies. Thank you.
